

Fogg Dam Conservation Reserve

Fact Sheet

Fogg Dam Conservation Reserve is one of several parks in the lower Adelaide River catchment that provide havens for wildlife amongst Darwin's developing rural fringe.

The Adelaide River catchment is one of several connected catchments which make up the Top End wetlands. These wetlands have international significance because of their beauty, natural systems and importance to Aboriginal people.

The Limilngan-Wulna people speak for the land in Fogg Dam Conservation Reserve and play an important role in its management.

The dam was built in the mid 1950's to provide irrigation for the Humpty Doo Rice Project. The RAAF Airfield Construction squadron built the dam and named it Fogg Dam after the Managing Director, Mr J D Fogg, of Utah Australia Ltd. When the agricultural scheme failed the dam had already become a dry season refuge for wildlife, especially waterbirds. Fogg Dam had become a Bird Protection District in 1959.

Access (see map)

Fogg Dam is located approximately 65 km east of Darwin along the Arnhem Highway. It has all weather access and is open all year.

When to Visit

Between December and July you may find a greater variety of birds, some quite easy to photograph, among lilies and other water plants which flower at this time of year.
